Trial of the Mountains

Along with Cervin, he was one of the few survivors of Trial of the Mountains, as the two teamed up, not only to survive the cold but to kill an Imperial Manticore threatening them. Something rare in a school, characterized by the loneliness of its Witchers. But that was accepted by the Bear Council as valid to give them the go-ahead to end their training.

Cormac visits the School of the Fox and integrates into the School (1301)

A messenger from the School of the Fox arrived with a missive from their grandmaster about an inter-school training initiative, asking for a witcher to volunteer to go to the School of the Fox's Burov Mylne as an instructor in exchange for a witcher to instruct at Haern Caduch, at first this was not well-received by the few witchers that still wintered at the old Bear keep but the plan was vouched for by Razan of Cintra and his two subordinates Sustor of Redania and Jag Laittatrson, so Cormac volunteered for the opening and made his way south to Burov Mylne. There he was welcomed with open arms along with three witchers from the School of the Griffin. He would take on the position of one of the trainers for the witcher apprentices. Finding the School and its people to be good agreeable folk he opted to integrate into the School. Cormac was offered a spot on the Master Council for his viewpoint and experience despite his young age (For a witcher), which he accepted.

Trivia

- Like his description in Wiedźmin: Gra Wyobraźni says, Cormac was a big fan of Geralt of Rivia and his stories. He took the White Wolf as a role model.
- Cormac is one of the youngest members of the School of the Bear.
- Cormac is a direct family of Amadis de Trastamara, a baron from Toussaint.
- Like many other witchers, this one became what it is, due to the Law of Surprise.
